End bird problems yourself with professional equipment!

"Urban pigeons are messy, dirty, unpleasant birds," states Kevin Sluka, Director of Public Works for Jersey City, New Jersey, population 240,000. Of the 27 public buildings that he and his staff of 250 are responsible for maintaining, one structure was an especially vulnerable and venerable target: City Hall, the city's primary administrative building housing all official records. Designed like a traditional old school with a central courtyard, City Hall occupies an entire city block. Over the years, City Hall had become a magnet for pigeons.

To combat the daily effects of perpetual pigeon droppings, Sluka's department dispatched one custodian to mop the steps every day and conducted frequent costly power washings of the historic brick structure, which dates from 1896. But the root cause of the problem continued unabated.

"We had our doubts," Sluka confesses, "but we went ahead and purchased two Super BirdXPellers." The price tag was easy on the city's budget, he noted. And it was a humane method of discouraging the birds without harming them and without raising the hackles of animal rights activists.

"Two summers ago, we installed the XPellers, and Bird-X gave us technical support," he says. The results were instantaneous. "Right away, the pigeons responded to the threatening noises and vacated the premises." Pigeons have not bothered City Hall since. "They're happier somewhere else," Sluka attests.
